Franklin Roosevelt seemed the only pilot who could weather the rising international storm. ... Thus the isolationists had some justification for seeing him as an instinctive internationalist.

Extract C

In the 1930s American leaders returned to some of the more fundamental principles of American foreign policy, which had been compromised by intervention in Europe in 1917 and by the economic squabbles of the 1920s. They were the values expressed by Cordell Hull: 'a primary interest in peace with justice, in economic well-being with stability and conditions of order under the law'. There were principles here on which most Americans could agree; to promote them the United States should avoid 'foreign entanglements', any kind of alliance or association outside the Western hemisphere. Instead the United States should act as a moral force in the world, stimulating an open and co-operative diplomacy, encouraging peaceful change where necessary, discouraging aggression. This is what Roosevelt called 'the good neighbour policy'. It sprang from a very moral, democratic view of the world; America encouraged the weak against the strong, condemned tyranny and reproached warmongers.
