SECTION A

Answer Question 01.

SOURCE A

From the ‘History of the Dukes of Normandy and the Kings of England’ by the unknown Flemish Chronicler, ‘Anonymous of Béthune’, early 13th century.

There was a very nasty streak in King John’s character. He was the most cruel of men. He often humiliated the most important men in the land because he was attracted to beautiful women, and this caused a great deal of hatred. He would never willingly tell the truth. He did his utmost to create friction between his barons, taking great delight in seeing this turn into hatred. In 1210 John attacked a magnate with whom he had quarrelled, William de Briouse. John imprisoned William’s wife, Maud de Briouse, and their son in Corfe castle, placing in their cell a sheaf of oats and some uncooked bacon. He allowed them no more food than this. Ten days after, the mother was found dead, sitting between the legs of her son. As for the son, he was also dead. The mother in her anguish had eaten both of her son’s cheeks. William de Briouse, who was in Paris at the time, died of grief shortly after he heard the news.

SOURCE B

From a letter to Archbishop Stephen Langton from Pope Innocent III, March 1213. John had recently offered peace terms to the Pope regarding his excommunication.

Sometimes the perversity of the wicked passes down by succession of blood from father to son. This is clearly apparent from the fact that Henry, King of the English, for a long time persecuted the blessed Thomas, Archbishop of Canterbury, who defended justice and ecclesiastical liberty and was later killed by the swords of the impious King's men. For a long time now his son John, King of England, for the same reason has been unjustly persecuting you and our beloved sons the monks of Canterbury and many others, driving you to live pitiably in exile deprived of your entire property. We, therefore, kindled with a zeal for ecclesiastical liberty, charge and strictly command you that, if the King should violate the peace which has been restored between him and the English Church by apostolic provision, neither you nor any others should anoint or crown any of his heirs. This action preserves the orders of the Apostolic See.

SOURCE C

From a chronicle compiled by the St Alban's monk, Wendover. Wendover lived through John's reign but wrote afterwards. Wendover describes events after rebel barons took control of London, May 1215.

King John, when he saw that he was deserted by almost all, so that out of his many followers he scarcely retained seven knights, was much alarmed lest the barons would attack his castles and take them without difficulty, as they would find no obstacle to their so doing. So he deceitfully pretended to make peace for a time with the barons and sent William Marshal, Earl of Pembroke, with other trustworthy messengers, to them, and told the barons that, for the sake of peace, the King would willingly grant them the laws and liberties they required. The King also sent word to the barons by the same messengers, to appoint a fitting day and place to meet and carry all these matters into effect. The King's messengers then came in all haste to London, and reported to the barons all that had been deceitfully told to them; they in their great joy appointed the fifteenth of June for the King to meet them.
